WILEY'S BRIGADE THE FIGHTING SECOND ON DRILL

The Pennsylvania militiamen who are to represent the Keystone State in the voluntary army asked for by President McKinley are encamped at Mount Gretna. The organizations designated by the Governor of the State to go into camp responded almost to a man, and when the muster call was sounded 99 per cent. of the men answered.

That in itself was a good enough showing, but to make it complete 97 per cent. of those men have volunteered to go into the regular army without proposing any conditions that they shall be commanded by their own officers or that the identity of their separate organizations shall be maintained. They are ready to go and to serve under any conditions.

All of which goes to show the truth of the observation of the man who said, when he saw a Pennsylvania regiment on parade, "They look like soldiers." Wherever the Pennsylvania troops have been seen they have been praised for their soldierly bearing, their martial appearance and their lack of all the qualities that go to make up the "paper soldier."

They have eliminated all superfluous and ornamental features, and it has been their motto that the enlisted man should be ready at any moment to take up arms, whether for his State or for his country.

The men now in camp include the famous First City Troop, of Philadelphia, the most exclusive military organization in the country. It is said of them that every one in the Troop had an ancestor that signed the Declaration of Independence, or was close at hand and wanted to. This troop has had a continuous organization since the Revolution and has been in every fight since that time.

At the camp are the regiments of the "Fighting Second Brigade"—the Eighteenth, of Pittsburg, under Col. Norman M. Smith; the Tenth, of Washington, under Col. Alexander Hawkins, and the Fifteenth, of Mercer, under Col. Kreps. They have all seen service and they want to see it again. The officers are just as anxious as the men to go to the front.
